I know it's too long, but I have some interesting news about certain types of bacteria that you probably found in your farms. I would like to take this opportunity to pass some useful information for you. In this newsletter, I will be unfolding thermophilic, thermophilic and psychrotrophic bacteria, the effects on your milk production and treatment. Thermophilic bacteria. Thermophilic bacteria can survive exposure at temperatures considerably above their maximum temperature for growth. In the Dairy Industry, the term is applied to organisms that survive, but do not grow, at pasteurizing temperature. They usually include species of micrococci, streptococci, lactobacillus, occasionally gram-negative bacilli and stems. The sources of contamination are utensils and poorly clean and hygienized equipment in farm and processing plants. These bacteria contribute to the significantly larger standard plate count in pasteurized milk (LPC counts). Thermophilic count has been used in distribution industry mainly as a care test employed in utensil sanitation and as a means of detection of responsible bodies sources
